The admiral gave orders that all Americans should withdraw from the city. Even the German consul abandoned his residence and went abourd the Kron Prinzessin Cecilie. The British Admiral, Sir Christopher Cradock, took up his temporary headquarters on a merchant steamer at the dock.

The Mexican gunboat Bravo was at the bend of the river below the city, firing westward over the town. The rebel general, Candido Aguilar, crossed below the Bravo from Tuxpan with 2,600 men and heavy guns. He controlled the mouth of the river and attacked the Bravo from behind, sweeping the gunboat's decks with rifle fire. Sharpnel burst over the outskirts of the lown, and stray shots killed and wounded civilians. Bodies could be seen hanging from telegraph poles. The straight on became so dangerous to noncombatants that Rear-Admiral Fletcher decided to send the refugees to the battleship lying off La Barra, five miles from the fighting zone.

Galveston, Texas, December 14.—The Norwegian steamship Mexicano, from Christiana, via Mexican ports, to-day arrived with eighty-six passengers embarked at Vera Cruz. Of this number twenty-two were Americans, the greater part of them from Mexico City.
The passengers reported that little apprehension was felt in Mexico City itself for the safety of foreigners. The report of a large American manufacturing firm sald that Mexican banks were advising depositors to keep their balances down to a minimum because of the possibility of enforced loans by the government, should any great amount of cash appear on hand.
